Despite being a core skill required by legal professionals, training in the drafting of clear and succinct pleadings is a scarce resource with many relying on precedents when required to draft documents.

Advocate Hussain

Drafting using precedents is a time consuming, manual process that results in less billable hours for attorneys. Relying on existing precedents that may not “fit the bill” can lead to a lack of clarity in documents created for presentation to the bench, costing time, causing frustration to members of the judiciary, and resulting delays.

Whether you are a fully-fledged legal counsel or candidate attorney, pupil advocate or seasoned professional, it’s time to save yourself – and the presiding judge – time and effort to ensure a better outcome for your client by enhancing your drafting skills.

“I must commend the author for the guidance he proffers in the book for the attainment of better drafting skills. Reading, Reading and more Reading will allow you to be a better draftsman.”
