As people, we've always been guided by our culture. It has been our compass for where we need to go and shone a light on where we're from. South Africa is well-known for its diversity, and we are considered a melting pot of ethnic and cultural diversity.

Colonisation, globalisation, and the more recent digitisation, have played a significant role in the modernisation of our society, therefore affording us different ways of doing things. So, what is the current relevance of African culture and values to contemporary society, and what is the purpose of certain cultural rules?

Viceroy Brandy, a brand deeply rooted in local cultural heritage, is embarking on a journey to help create an informed view of culture and tradition, by unpacking the real significance behind our cultural practices and addressing modern misconceptions. How? By creating a platform that encourages South Africans to engage in conversations, around various cultural topics, with contrasting thought leaders and cultural experts. #Vulumlomo

Vul'umlomo literally translates to 'open the mouth', which is precisely what this platform aims to do: allow our communities to air their views and share knowledge on cultural topics close to their hearts and lived realities and dispelling harmful myths.

Viceroy's Vul'umlomo | Conversations on Culture is a series of panel discussions moderated by Robert Marawa, that tackles South African's views on cultural and traditional practices within a modern and progressive society. The first episode in the series aired on 17 November 2021 on Viceroy's social media sites, with Robert Marawa moderating a discussion between Mbuso Khoza, Candice Ashley Dube, Dr Bishop Jessica Mbangeni and His Royal Highness Prince Itumeleng Shole – a panel that promises a mixture of traditionalist and a modernist views.

The public can also 'open their mouths' and partake in the discussions by posting their questions and comments on either Twitter @Viceroy_SA, Instagram @Viceroy.sa or Facebook @ViceroySouthAfrica with the hashtag #Vulumlomo.
